The Barton family story in Boothbay Harbor traces back five generations. One summer, they drove north from Foxborough, Massachusetts, to vacation on the water—and ever since the family has established deeper roots, building a cluster of cottages so that future generations could relish the delights of the seaside community.

So when Lisa, a member of the family's fifth generation based in California, learned that a house in her family's neighborhood was going on the market, she was quick to act.

"It's our happy place," Lisa says. For years, she spent summers with siblings, cousins, and friends, falling in love with this unique community and its traditions: tennis lessons on clay courts, days cruising in little whalers. "We're really connected to each other. This place is so special that it's solidified our relationships in a whole different way. Even though we don't see each other all year—some of us are in California, some are on the East Coast—we all look forward to being there."

"Now, as adults, we've reconnected with a lot of those friends that we've made

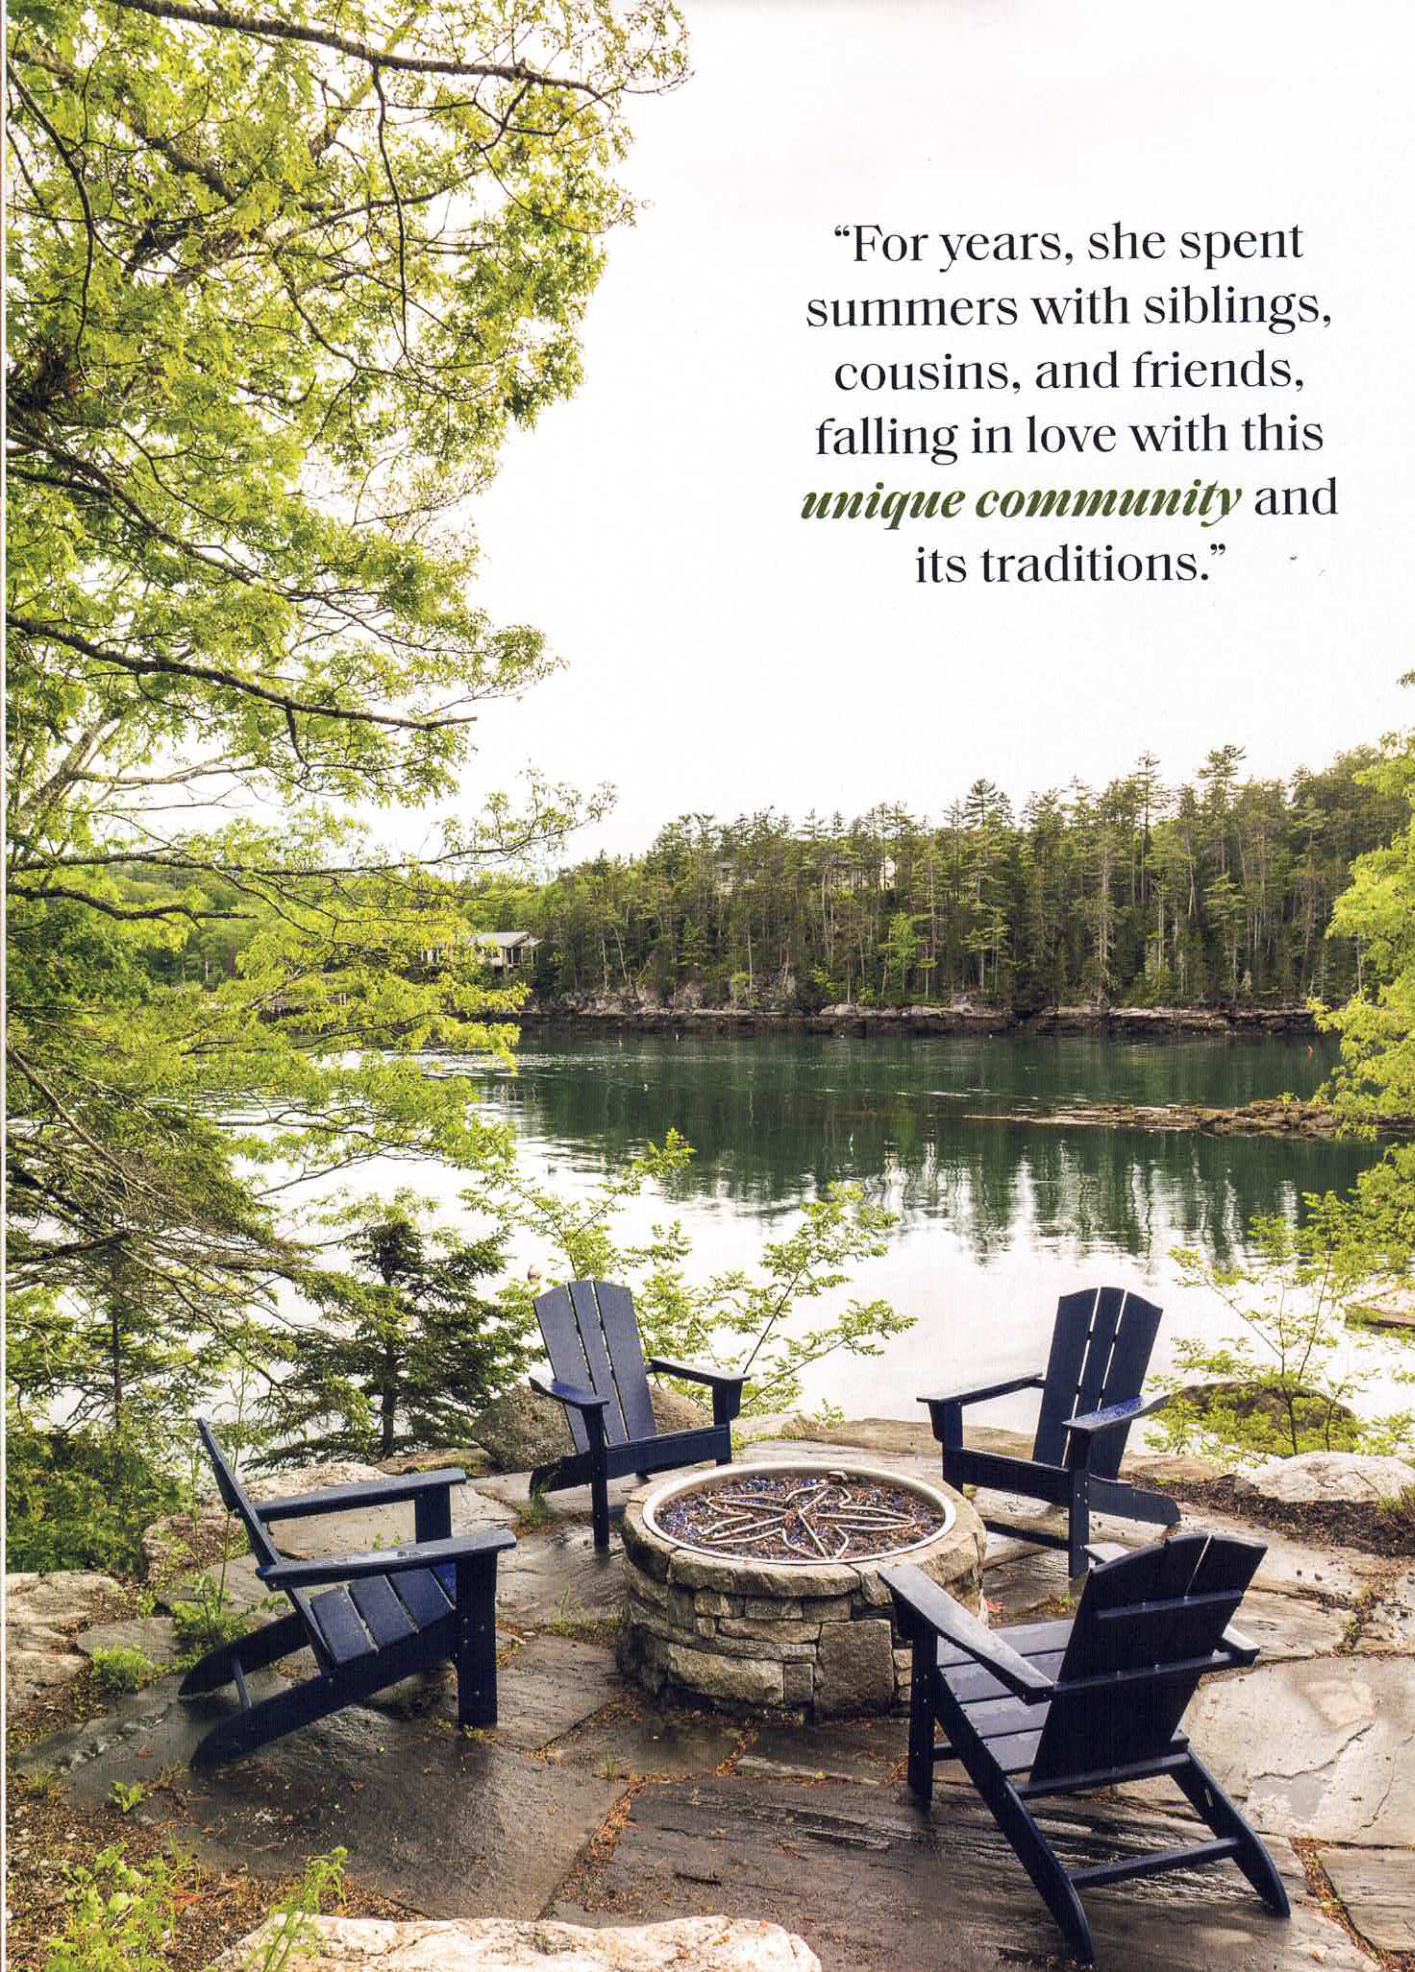

High ceilings and an open concept facilitate days entertaining old friends. Blues and earth tones complement Boothbay's natural beauty.
